Abstract

In this extensive study, we expect to summarize some urgent problems of our world. We believe that the Orthodox spirituality and theology can offer a real perspective if we are looking to find some answers about our needs today. After a short introduction, we describe what means ecology for Christians. In the Orthodox Church, the Patriarch of Constantinople, Bartholomew I, is worldwide known for his ecological activity, receiving the surname of Green Patriarch. The human being is called by God and he is called to work and to take care of God's creation. For us, the saints are the models when we look to someone who indeed had a moral collaboration with the creation of God. Also, we mention the real problems such as pollution, the global warming, the melting of the polar glaciers, the lack of drinking water and in connection with all these, deterioration of the quality of human life and the moral degradation of the human being. If we look to the relation of human being with creation comprised in the law of God, we will find the good solution for our world and for our children's world. The Church of Christ has the moral duty to warn the society about these real problems and to offer the good lens when we ask how we should to relate with the whole creation. Even so, the Church does not pretend to take the place of politics or even of sciences intelligentia, but she urges for an honest and transparent debate in order to protect the faith, moral values and the common good. We offer also a full list with conclusions related with the problems discussed in our study.
