Abstract

In the pluri-religious world in which we live, the interreligious dialogue is a priority and an obligation for the believers of any religion. Everyday life requires relationships with the people of the other faiths and ideologies to peace and mutual understanding.

Over the time, in the General Meetings of the World Council of Churches (WCC) have been discussed and addressed issues with interreligious nature.

The results could be analyzed in what followed these meetings, in the sense that the taken decisions could be applied in territories where the believers of various religions live.

The General Assembly from Busan, South Korea, was the tenth meeting organized by the WCC.

Without the issue of interreligious dialogue on the agenda, in the meetings were discussed also themes on the relations between Christians and representatives of other faiths and ideologies.

The main idea drawn from the Assembly is that the followers of different religions should work together to establishment and maintenance of the peace on earth and human rights in the territories where they live with the brothers of the other faiths.

If this requirement will be or not fulfilled, it will be able to see by analyzing the effects of these decisions in a medium and long term.
